The Spirit of Cricket

A poem celebrating the game, its teamwork, and its spirit

Beneath the sky, the players stand,
A bat held firm in a steady hand.
The bowler runs, the crowd draws near,
A rising cheer fills the atmosphere.

The red ball flashes across the green,
A sudden blur, a moment keen.
The batter watches, calm and bright,
Then sends it soaring into flight.

The fielders sprint across the ground,
While drums and claps make thunderous sound.
A diving catch, a stumps-wide throw,
And joy erupts from row to row.

Some innings bloom, some wickets fall,
Yet courage answers every call.
A quiet single, a mighty six,
Each moment adds to cricket's mix.

The captain plans, the teammates trust,
In rain or heat, through grit and dust.
A shared high-five, a word of cheer,
Can turn the tide when hope seems sheer.

The scoreboard tells what runs were made,
But not the price of every blade.
It cannot show the hours of toil,
The patient practice, sweat, and soil.

For cricket teaches more than score,
It shows us how to strive for more.

To win with grace, to lose with pride,
To stand together, side by side.

From village fields to stadium lights,
The game brings strangers' hearts alight.
Each nation sings, each fan believes,
Each final ball makes time seem freeze.

And when the last appeal is done,
When shadows stretch beneath the sun,
The pitch grows still, the echoes stay,
With tales to tell another day.

So let the bat and ball remind,
Of skill, respect, and spirit kind.
For more than trophies, fame, or art,
Cricket is a game that joins the heart.
